Military Discipline. "In the year 1846," writes "Santa Cruz," under the title of Military Tactics, "a gentleman of the legal profession, who resides at the present time in Sacramento county, received a captain's commission from Commodore Stockton with orders to organise a volunteer corps. Yorba Buena contained in 1846 a very sparse population, but by the indefatigable exertions of Capt. H., a respectable body of men were induced to put their names to an instrument of writing, the substance of which was that they would agree to serve as volunteers during the war, in company B. The Captain had great difficulty in distinguishing his men from other citizens, as they had no uniform. 'o make a marked distinction, the Captain purchased a number of bell-crowned hats, very tall, and ridiculously huge at the top. The hat most generally in use was the low-crowned, slouched California hat. At a meeting of the company, the uniforn, as it was called, was unanimously adopted. Some objections were made to the great height of the crown of the hat, but as such objections came from persons who were in the habit of carrying more bricks in their hats than they could conveniently balance, they were voted down by the old and regular drinkers, as unworthy of consideration. Notwithstanding this rebuke from the veterans, several of the younger members in iniquity made their appearance on parade in a state bordering on intoxication. They were ordered to fall into line. All obeyed the order but one, a Mr. P., well known to those who lived here in "fortion, and No. 2 Dey street with affiliation; having ty six." Mr. P. backed up against one of the posts

Know-Nothing Split in Delaware.

Clayton Denounced. We learn from the Wilmington (Delaware) Statesman of the 27th Sept., that there has been a split among the Know-Nothings in that strong-hold of the order: and that Senator Clayton, the great leader of the party, and recently their favorite candidate for the Presidency, is ruled out and sent to the "Grand Dads." The trouble arose from a "secret movement" in the order-a wheel within a wheel-a secret more deep and covered than the grand secret order itself. Of course nothing like a "secret" movement could be tolerated in the Society of Know-Nothings, and prompt measures were taken to put it down. The Statesman, the anti-Clayton organ, says of a part of the order: Many of them are professed friends of Temperance yet they voted the Rum ticket at the late city election, and were the most bitter enemies the friends of Promotion were called to encounter at that time. * * It is an interesting part of the history of the veteran wire-pullers, that when it became evident that a large available force was collecting under the mysterious shadow of the Know-Nothings, they went as a body into the organization. Their object of course was to sustain the measures of their new friends, except as secondary to the main purpose, which was to control the movements of the party. But it so happened, that the members of the order had the design of thinking and acting for themselves, and hence a fierce and protracted contest. Night after night for weeks together, the battle was continued. Never did lespairing men grasp more ardently to retain some shred of their fading influence, than did these remnants of Hunkerism to secure a position by which their ultimate objects might be attained. But rarely was a defeat more signal. To repair, if possible, the disasters of this terrible rout, these men withdrew in a body, and formed the dignified and disinterested association known as the Grandads. Obtaining a charter BY FRAUD, they set up for themselves with the avowed object of absorbing the Native American influence. * * * * * * *

The Clayton party is forever prostrated; and upon its ruins a people's party will be constructed, taking cognizance of the People's Measures, and eschewing the advice and leadership, which has hitherto exercised control, for the promotion of its own selfishness.
